The English major at Pitt is responsive to many of the traditional goals of a liberal arts education: it seeks to develop a broad critical and historical understanding of influential cultural traditions and to foster a range of reading and writing strategies as well as skills of critical analysis. It prepares students for careers in teaching or writing. The skills and knowledge it imparts are useful in numerous business and professional settings, as well. For example, English is highly regarded as a pre-professional major for further training in law, medicine, or business. The Director of Academic Affairs for the Association of American Medical colleges said in 1986 that English majors have a higher rate of acceptance at medical schools than students who majored in the biological and physical sciences. The literature major is designed to develop a critical understanding of literary and cultural traditions in English that is at once informed, skeptical, and appreciative. One of the distinctive features of the literature curriculum at Pitt is the recurrent concern, from introductory to the most advanced undergraduate courses, with questions of how and why we read and write and participate in cultural activities, with the contexts in which a range of literary texts and films are produced, understood, evaluated and used, and with the changing role of art and culture in the contemporary world. The major offers students opportunities to study canonical works of British and American literature from medieval times to the present; often, these texts are studied in conjunction with historical or philosophical works, with other national literatures in English, and with films or works of popular culture. In many courses, the student's own writing will be an important object of study.
